GEORGE S. GILBERT.

Motion to dismiss the George S. Gilbert.

Motion to dismiss the defendants is, that this court has no jurisdiction and Practice 478 et seq. Mauro vs. Almeida 10 Wheaton's Rep. 473). It is considered a most salutary proceeding in the United States, and one of great utility to commerce. Our admiralty practice has not been prescribed by our statutes, except to a limited extent in a very few instances, and, where it is not prescribed our courts are left free to adopt so much of that of England, France, the United States and other maritime countries, as they may think wise, just; and best adapted to the the defendants is, that this court has no jurisdiction in the case, on the ground trat it belongs to the common law, rather than to the admirally side of the court, and they contend that there can be no admirably invised at the court, and they contend that there can be no admirably invised at the court, and they contend that there can be no admirably invised at the court of the United States in the inbe no admiralty jurisdiction except in cases of a stance? I think it is. But, say the learned counmaritime lien. The supplies, say they, for which this suit is instituted, were furnished not to the "Nile," the vessel attached, but to the "Walter Claxton," and though the jurisdiction would be good and complete were the "Walter Claxton" true, there is no lien on the "Nile" for thise supplies. proceeded against, yet it cannot hold against the "Nile," even granting that she has the same owners and captain. Now, clearly the plaintiff had no for, and none sought to be enforced in the present ers and captain. Now, clearly the plaintiff had no lien on the "Nile" for supplies furnished to the "Walter Claxton," and if the proposition of the learned counsel be true, that there can be no admiralty jurisdiction unless in cases of a maritime lien, then his point is made good, and the plaintiff must seek his remedy somewhere else. But let us examine this matter. The eighty-fourth article of the Constitution of the Hawaiian Islands declares that the judicial power shall extend "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," and Section 2., of the Act relating to the Judiciary Department, passed on the 3d of December 1852, confers upon this court jurisdiction "in all admiralty and maritime cases;" and which jurisdiction is precisely the same as that existing in risdiction is precisely the same as that existing in the admiralty courts of the United States.—(Constitution of the United States Article 3. Section 2) It only remains then, for us to determine what are make good his demand. The learned counsel make good his demand. cases of "admiralty and maritime jurisdiction" seem to misapprehend the nature of this proceed-under the practice of the courts of the United ing altogether, and treat it as a process in rem States, which practice has been mainly derived against the "Nile," while in fact it is no such

But say the learned counsel, granting the court has jurisdiction, we contend that the plaintiff has no right to issue an attachment against our property, unless he complies with the provisions of the statute in cases of attachment issuing from the courts of the district justices. He must not only give us a bond to save us harmless from all damages but he must make an affidavit of certain facts provided in the statute; which he has not done, and hence the suit should be dismissed.

If this case was of a like nature with those referred to in the statute, or the process the same as that contemplated in sections 6, 7 and 8, pp. 14, 15, of the 2d vol. of the statutes, then the argument to dismiss this suit for nonconformity therewith the sections of the statutes, and there acknowledged to having inceived their pay from the shipping master. This evidence with might have weight; but it is totally different.

The conkling's Admiralty Jurisdiction and Process Provided in my power to prevent unnecessary litigation.

Before issuing the process prayed for, I must be satisfied that the wages claimed are probably really owing, and are unjustifiably withheld. Now what are the facts of the case. It is agreed by both parties that the complainants were shipped "by the run," for a voyage from San Francisco to Honolution, or a voyage from San Francisco to Honolution, or a voyage from San Francisco the baring of the only difference between the parties is, that the only difference between the parties is, that the complainants were altiple of the only difference between the paid in advance; in full, it being the custom of that port that wages in full, it being the custom of that port that the case of the task of the case.
